Thomas Bender,

and the Committee on Graduate Education of the American Historical Association

The Education of Historians for the Twenty-first Century addresses the transformations the historical professions have undergone in the last forty years, including changes in ethnic and gender composition of graduate students and faculty, the challenging and refining of historical methodologies, and the expanding of boundaries of historical inquiry. Combining a detailed snapshot of the profession with a rigorous analysis of these changes, this volume includes practical suggestions for managing institutional change as well as advice for everyone involved in the advanced training of historians.
