Interactive Sources and Studies on Ancient Greece

GREGORY CRANE, Editor in Chief

PERSEUS

Yale University Press is proud to announce the publication of a multimedia interactive database that will revolutionize the study of ancient Greek civilization, expanding the ways in which ancient Greek literature, history, art and archaeology can be examined. The database, named after the mythological hero who explored the limits of the known world, is published on CD-ROM with full colour images available on videodisc.

Perseus provides the beginning student with a solid introduction to Greek antiquity and also offers powerful research possibilities to the specialist. The first edition in the series, Perseus I.O, includes an overview of Greek history, works in Greek and in translation by ten authors from the archaic and classical periods, an on-line version of Liddell and Scott's Intermediate Greek Lexicon, and a classical encyclopedia that glosses architectural terms and vase shapes. Among its thousands of illustrations are topographical maps of Greece annotated with place names, views — both still shots and motion pictures — of sites and scenes throughout Greece, and a catalogue of several hundred objects of Greek art.

Perseus is distributed in Hypercard and runs on Macintosh computers. The minimal configuration is a Mac Classic with hard disc, 2Mb of RAM, and an Apple-compatible CD player. The optimal, which provides capability for using digital images, is a Macintosh LC or better, with at least 4Mb of RAM, a hard disk, colour monitor and 8-bit colour-graphics board, and an Apple-compatible CD player. A videodisk player and video monitor can be used with either of these configurations to obtain the images available on videodisc. For more information contact the marketing department (telephone 071-431 4422).

"The Perseus project represents one of the most exciting developments in the teaching of Classical Studies this century. I know of no finer way to get students interested in the Greco-Roman world and to enable them to pursue their interests through the simultaneous study of literature, history, art and archaeology. Every Classics department ought to have a copy!" — Dr. Don Fowler, Fellow and Tutor in Classics, Jesus College, Oxford, Oxford University Schools Liaison Officer in Classics

"As a resource for teaching and research, Perseus is revolutionary. Never before have so many different kinds of material been integrated into one system, enabling scholars to work not just with texts or with pictures, but with as close to a complete cultural context as it is possible to create artificially. It is a paradigm for the development of hypermedia systems in the humanities." — Marilyn Deegan, Director of Computers in Teaching Centre for Textual Studies/Office for Humanities Communication
