

In its outward aspects, the method of teaching is much the same as before, except that the classic form of lectures and seminars has been combined, on a large scale, with the freer method of exercises and discussion. Thus, on the whole, there has been hardly any change in New Testament instruction in relation to that of the past generation. The decrease of historical interest, it is true, and the reorientation toward purely theological problems makes itself felt more in instruction than in research, though there are already symptoms which seem to indicate a change.
