

Why Younger Scholars In All Fields Dealing With Great Britain Should Join The Conference On British Studies

At a time when job placement is slow and difficult, the advantages of a specialized professional association increase. The Conference on British Studies cannot offer jobs but it does provide younger scholars, historians, scholars of English literature and of political science, with facilities for acquaintanceship, professional contact, and publication within their various disciplines. It supports two journals, holds two national and many more regional meetings each year, and maintains a policy of keeping a place for recent degree holders on its own programs and in its sessions at the American Historical Association. It will have this year a second session at the A.H.A. exclusively for recent Ph.D.'s in British Studies to discuss their thesis research. It publishes a review of current research in British Studies and sponsors the publication of short book-length monographs.

To make membership easier for scholars about to finish a degree, the C.B.S. has established an introductory graduate student membership which costs $5 per year instead of the usual $8. It is available for a single three-year term. All you need to do is write the Treasurer of the C.B.S. and request a dues form. His address is: Professor Stuart E. Prall, Department of History, Queens College, City University of New York, Flushing, New York 11367.
