

THE BERLIN SECESSION

Modernism and Its Enemies in Imperial Germany

Peter Paret

In the first detailed history of the Impressionist group called the Berlin Secession, Paret traces the politics and personalities of its leaders and their struggles against the traditionalism of Emperor William II and his power elite.

“A strikingly original and significant contribution to an understanding of German history in the critical years before 1914.” – Otto Büsch, Chairman, Berlin Historical Commission

SOCIAL HISTORY

An International Journal

Edited by Janet Blackman and Keith Nield

Department of Economic and Social History, University of Hull

'Social History has without a doubt immediately established itself as enormously superior to all English-language journals in the field, with the possible exception of Past and Present.'

The Times Educational Supplement

Social History publishes the best work available in social historical writing, especially of a theoretical and polemical kind where this retains a secure grasp on the empirical. The journal seeks to be international in content, to cover all periods, and to pursue the exploration of relations with other disciplines, especially sociology, social anthropology, demography and development studies, which increasingly seek historical perspectives.

The Making of a STORMTROOPER

Singling out members of the most actively militant wing of the Nazi movement, Peter Merkl explores the historical, sociological, and personal factors that motivated their attitudes and behavior. The principal resource for his inquiry is Theodore Abel's collection of 581 autobiographical statements of early Nazis. What emerges is a fascinating, integrated picture of the motives of the stormtroopers and the circumstances under which they fostered the transition from a fringe movement to a mass movement and hence to the success of Adolf Hitler in taking over the country.
