The Journal aims to promote the study of the history, institutions, literature and culture of the United States.

It publishes work by specialists of any nationality on American history, literature, politics, geography and related subjects. Articles which cross the conventional lines of those disciplines are welcome, as are comparative studies of American and other cultures. It also disseminates information about work in progress and provides a platform for the exchange of scholarly information and opinion.

The editorial policy is not committed to any political viewpoint or ideology, but will not preclude responsible discussion of controversial topics.
