COMING

Barbara Ward has contended for decades that rich nations have everything to gain by commitment to the development of the poor. SUDHIR SEN assesses her contribution and draws some urgent conclusions about concrete steps for the years immediately ahead. . . . The mass suicides in Jonestown, Guyana, provoked a universal response of horror at religious and political "fanaticism." One of America's leading ethicists, STANLEY HAUERWAS, explains why the Jewish-Christian tradition forces us to acknowledge elements of truth in the cultists' essentially demonic statement. . . . Sakharov's exile is the short-term fact, but WALTER CLEMENS argues that current movements in the Soviet Union may be leading to a longer-term resurgence of the intelligentsia. . . . The "lessons" of Vietnam are read differently by different actors in world politics. FRANCIS T. UNDERHILL analyzes the lessons read by many Southeast Asian leaders who want a reliable U.S. presence in that part of the world. . . . JAMES NUECHTERLEIN surveys the winners and losers in the last ten years of cultural-political wars in an essay review of Norman Podhoretz's Breaking Ranks. . . . And much more in WORLDVIEW, the magazine that gets ethics into the debate about the kind of world we have and hope to have.
