

EDITORS' NOTE

In the first issue of Economics and Philosophy, D. Wade Hands argued that Karl Popper's philosophy of social science was not Popperian—that is, not falsificationist. This argument creates some difficulty for economists like Mark Blaug who have proposed to apply Popperian falsificationist standards to economic theory. In the accompanying comment, Blaug describes his preferred resolution of the resulting dilemma.