The Opening Dilemma: Why Democracies Cannot Found Themselves

Richard Bensel

Abstract

Democratic states often claim that their authority rests upon the “will of the people” as expressed through representative institutions. However, there is an irresolvable conundrum that undermines that claim: the “opening dilemma” that invariably attends the founding of democratic states during which those representative institutions are created. While familiar to democratic theorists, the “opening dilemma” has many hitherto unexplored dimensions, among them its actual occurrence in democratic politics. Using the 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention as a case study, the article demonstrates why individual preferences cannot effect a founding without the intervention of arbitrary and thus undemocratic authority. The conclusion suggests why the opening dilemma might become a serious threat to American democracy if the nation were to attempt to convene a new constitutional convention.

There is a very important conundrum inextricably embedded in the democratic conception of the “will of the people.” This conundrum involves an “opening dilemma” that makes it impossible to create a constitutional assembly without relying on arbitrary decisions as to who will participate and how they will deliberate.¹ As a result, a democracy cannot found itself because the will of the people cannot, in the absence of unauthorized intervention, create an institutional form through which the people can rule themselves. Political theorists have primarily focused on the abstract problem of democratic legitimacy that attends the failure of a people to authorize themselves as a political collective. This study extends that discussion in several ways.

As political theorists have often noted, it is impossible for people to democratically decide that they constitute a “people.” This inability seriously, if not fatally, undermines their collective right to make democratic decisions that can bind those who dissent. Seyla Benhabib, for example, concludes that “we face a paradox internal to democracies, namely that democracies cannot choose the boundaries of their own membership democratically.”² Jason Frank notes that that Rousseau’s invocation of the Lawgiver as a solution “actually models fundamental dilemmas of authorization that necessarily haunt the theory and practice of democratic politics.”³ And, as Howard Schweber observes, this dilemma of democratic authorization involves “a basic political principle that those actors [who create a democratic state] are agents who represent (with all the myriad variations of that concept) the sole authorizing agent, the people.”⁴

Bonnie Honig has described the theoretical angst that results from this impossibility as “democratic theory’s uncomfortable yet unavoidable dependence on the unreliable even phantom agency of the ‘people’ who may be called into being when called on in democratic politics.” Working through the sometimes complicated analytical acrobatics of theorists such as Seyla Benhabib and Jürgen Habermas, Honig concludes that the “paradox of founding” is that “the people do not yet exist as a people,” and thus “neither does a general will. The solution cannot be the right procedure or standpoint, for the people are in the untenable position of seeking to generate, as an outcome of their actions, the very general will that is supposed to motivate them into action.”⁵

For his part, Habermas notes that “the constitutional assembly cannot itself vouch for the legitimacy of the rules according to which it was constituted.”⁶ He then contends that the solution is to view politics as a continuously unfolding “founding” in which the democratic legitimation of a constitution is a never-ending work in progress. Honig, on the other hand, concludes that we must nonetheless “demand that the lawgiving/charlatan institutions by which we are always already governed and shaped be responsive to the plural, conflicting agents who together are said to authorize or benefit from them: the ever-changing and infinitely sequential people, the multitude, and their remnants.”⁷ This, of course, simply shifts attention to the ongoing politics of a democratic society, a politics that owes its organization and design to the arbitrary decisions that enabled the founding of that society in the first place. In effect, this focus on the ongoing politics of a democratic society merely justifies itself through a circular logic while ignoring the profound theoretical implications of the opening dilemma. Among those implications is the fact that entire democratic project is founded on an unavoidable contradiction.

In extending this discussion, I do several things. First, I formally restate the problem and thus illustrate that it involves three interrelated elements: the identity of the people (and their authorized representatives); the adoption of rules of procedure that would transform their speech acts into meaningful legislative actions; and the selection of a presiding officer who would both recognize people to make such speech acts and interpret their relation to the rules of procedure. Second, I provide an empirical analysis of how these several elements all play a part in the creation of a constitutional convention (and, thus, in the democratic founding of a state). This analysis also demonstrates how the opening dilemma can involve a very real problem with no logical solution.

Third, I offer an explanation for why the opening dilemma rarely surfaces in the practical politics of constitutional conventions. However, the very fact that it is rarely manifested means that political actors are wholly unprepared for its consequences when it does appear. Finally, I briefly suggest that there the opening dilemma might actually threaten the survival of American democracy if the United States were to attempt to hold a new constitutional convention.

I will take these things up in that order, beginning with a formal statement of the opening dilemma, then proceeding to a close analysis of the proceedings of the Illinois Constitutional Convention in 1869 in which the opening dilemma presented a very serious problem, and concluding with some thoughts on the implications of the opening dilemma for both the theory and political practice of democratic states.⁸

1. The Opening Dilemma

A basic principle of almost all democratic theories is that a constitutional convention embodies the will of the people through and by way of its decisions. For that principle to be realized in political practice, the will of the people must also direct and determine the creation of the convention. However, the convention itself is the only legitimate authority through which the will of the people can be expressed, and it has not yet itself been created. In order to resolve this opening dilemma, a democratic institution must simultaneously create itself while also determining who will constitute the “people,” who will represent them in the chamber, and how those representatives will make decisions. As many political theorists have noted, this is impossible in theory. In this article, I will demonstrate that it is also dangerous in practice.

Because the opening dilemma always attends the moment when a constitutional convention is created, it is theoretically unavoidable. However, the opening dilemma, once resolved, does not further complicate democratic decision making; it only appears during the creation of a democratic institution. Once a constitutional convention is created, the members are the sole judges of the qualifications of their colleagues, are solely responsible for the election of its presiding officer, and solely determine the procedural rules under which they deliberate. The political autonomy of a constitutional convention depends on these prerogatives and, in turn, its legitimacy as the embodiment of the will of the people depends on that autonomy. The problem involves the creation of that convention.

Three decisions must be made when such a constitutional convention is created: a presiding officer must be chosen, rules of procedure must be adopted, and the members must be recognized as the legitimate representatives of their constituencies. The opening dilemma arises from the fact that each of these decisions is a necessary precondition for the others (see Table 1). For example, a presiding officer cannot be chosen unless the members have been recognized as legitimate representatives of their constituencies and rules of procedure have been adopted. The presiding officer can only be chosen when these things have already been decided. In turn, rules of procedure cannot be adopted unless there is a presiding officer who can recognize (and thus authorize) a motion to that effect and the credentials of the members as agents of the people have been approved. Finally, the credentials of prospective members of the constitutional convention cannot be officially validated unless procedures for determining their validity have been adopted and a presiding officer has been chosen who can then recognize a motion to that effect.

Put another way, a presiding officer (most commonly, the president of a constitutional convention) cannot be democratically selected in the absence of an electorate (credentialed members) who are able to vote. And members are unable to offer and dispose of motions that might otherwise certify them as delegates if there is no presiding officer who can recognize them for that purpose. In the absence of such an officer, their motions (speech acts) are formally meaningless. Finally, in the absence of formal rules (which, like a presiding officer, must be democratically approved), members cannot even perform simple but necessary functions such as closing a debate so that the assembly can make a decision. Thus, at the very beginning of such an assembly, when the gathering is attempting to organize itself for the purpose of crafting a new constitution, there must be and always will be arbitrary decisions.⁹ These arbitrary decisions resolve the opening dilemma confronting the constitutional convention by imposing ⁷Honig, “Between Decision and Deliberation,” 15.

⁸In some of the canonical works in political theory, such as Jean-Jacques Rousseau’s Social Contract (1762) and Carl Schmitt’s The Crisis of Parliamentary Democracy (1926), this “opening dilemma” is referred to as a “founding paradox.” I prefer the former because founding conventions must overcome this dilemma in order to begin their deliberations. The usual meaning of the notion of a paradox does not carry the same connotation.

⁹This initial step is arbitrary in the sense that it supersedes and thus violates the convention’s presumptuous legitimacy as an embodiment of the will of the people. As I will show later, these arbitrary decisions are almost always thickly embedded in the political culture and power relations that provide much of the context for the gathering.

Table 1. The Opening Dilemma Attending the Creation of a Constitutional Convention

Organizational Elements of a Constitutional Convention	Necessary Preconditions for the Creation or Adoption of Each Organizational Feature
Election of a presiding officer	In order to elect a presiding officer, there are two preconditions: (a) the members of the convention must already be recognized as legitimate representatives of their constituencies, and (b) there must be rules of procedure for both the nomination of candidates and conduct of an election.
Recognition of the credentials of the members	In order to accept the credentials of members as the legitimate representatives of their constituencies, there are two preconditions: (a) the members must have already elected a presiding officer who can recognize a motion for that purpose, and (b) there must be rules of procedure that provide for the recognition of such a motion.
Adoption of rules of procedure	In order to adopt rules of procedure, there are two preconditions: (a) the members of the convention must have already been recognized as the legitimate representatives of their constituencies, and (b) the members must have already elected a presiding officer who can recognize a motion for that purpose.

Note: The opening dilemma arises from the fact that no constitutional convention can avoid arbitrarily creating at least two of these three organizational elements: a presiding officer, recognition of the members, and adoption of rules of procedure. "Arbitrary" means acting in a manner that supersedes and is thus contrary to the convention's presumptuous legitimacy as the embodiment of the "will of the people." The opening dilemma also applies to those legislative assemblies in which, on the one hand, all the members turnover in an election and, on the other hand, the chamber's legitimacy rests upon its autonomy from all other political institutions. For the example, the opening dilemma both theoretically applies to and has appeared in practice in the United States House of Representatives. However, because the United States Senate is a "continuing" body, the opening dilemma cannot appear when it reconvenes in a new Congress.

by fiat at least two of the three preconditions: adoption of rules, selection of a presiding officer, and/or formal recognition of the members.¹⁰

We will now turn to an instance when the opening dilemma was strikingly revealed in the organizing sessions of a constitutional convention. In this instance, the revelation that there was no way to proceed without making an arbitrary decision demonstrated, on the one hand, the fundamental connection between the "will of the people" and the creation of the convention and, on the other hand, that this connection must be superseded and violated in practice.

In November 1868, the people of the state of Illinois voted to hold a new constitutional convention by a slim majority of 1,408 votes (223,134 to 221,726). The state legislature subsequently issued the call for a convention to be composed of eighty-five members who would be elected from the same districts as those serving in the Illinois House of Representatives. The state legislature also provided that the election of the delegates would be conducted in the same way as in ordinary elections, that the delegates would be paid six dollars per diem plus travel expenses, and that the constitution adopted in the convention be submitted to the people for their approval. Eighty-five delegates were thus chosen in the November 2, 1869, election: forty-four Republicans and forty-one Democrats.¹¹

In 1862, Illinois had also convened a constitutional convention, but that constitution had been rejected, and the state constitution, which had been revised in 1848, was now two decades old. The motivation behind the new convention was a perceived need to modernize political institutions; enable policy responses to the rapid growth of corporate (primarily railroad) power; better provide public education to the children of the state; and address some of the now archaic (but still controversial) racial exclusions with respect to suffrage, militia service, and immigration into the state. Among other things, the constitution produced by this convention was intended to eliminate corruption by providing more secure and remunerative positions for government officials and impose more equitable rates for railroad operations (ultimately leading to the U.S. Supreme Court decision Munn v. Illinois, which upheld state regulation of rates charged by grain elevators). Illinois voters later approved the new constitution in its entirety (the primary text and eight separate propositions) in a referendum.

¹⁰As the reader may already have noticed, the opening dilemma is actually broader than the "democratic paradox" in that, even if the people were somehow created or recognized democratically (suspending for a moment that this is an impossibility), their representatives would still be (theoretically) unable to organize a constitutional convention except by unanimous consent. This extension is important even though the problem of providing legitimating credentials to the representatives turns out, in practice, to be more serious.

2. The 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention

The delegates to the Illinois Constitutional Convention assembled in the state capitol building in Springfield at about half-past two o'clock on December 13, 1869.¹² The place and day (although not the precise time of day) had been designated in the same law that had authorized the election in which the delegates had been selected. And to that extent and that extent only, the convention was the creature of the legislature that had enacted the law.¹³

The first entry in the convention record is an announcement by one of the delegates, Lawrence Church:

Gentlemen: The Convention will please come to order, and that we may proceed by some system, (as we do not know the difference between the delegates here, and others), I move that the Hon. William Cary, from Jo Daviess county, take the chair, as temporary President of this Convention.

As is the case in almost all constitutional conventions, there was no presiding officer when the delegates assembled. There were also no rules and recognized membership. Thus, when Church called for order, he was acting upon his own personal authority, an authority that could be rejected by any other person in the chamber because the chamber was not yet organized. His reason for so acting on his own authority tacitly rested upon practical necessity (“that we may proceed by some system”) because, in fact, there was no procedural structure in place at that moment. One of the consequences of that lack of structure was that “we do not know the difference between the delegates here, and others” who might also be in the chamber. In other words, the delegates had not yet been recognized as duly elected, a precondition for their ability to act as agents of the people they ostensibly represented. As a first step in remedying these defects, Church moved that one of his colleagues “take the chair.” While utterly ordinary in and of itself, his initiative was still quite audacious in that no one had, in a parliamentary sense, recognized him for the purpose of offering this (or, in fact, any other) motion. In fact, without rules and in the absence of a presiding officer, no one could recognize him for the purpose of offering this motion.

¹³The state legislature had thus (a) called for a convention to revise the constitution, (b) provided for the election of delegates, and (c) assigned a place and date for the convention to meet. Since the convention could not have spontaneously provided these things before it was created, the legislature's actions were necessary facilitating steps. In his treatise on constitutional conventions, Roger Sherman Hoar put it, "the people have not the machinery to hold a convention, unless they are assisted either by the legislature or the constitution." Roger Sherman Hoar, Constitutional Conventions: Their Nature, Powers, and Limitations (Boston: Little, Brown, 1917), 224. As we shall see, the legislature's stipulations did not bind the convention once it began to deliberate because "the people can, and the legislature cannot, restrict a convention" (p. 124). On the other hand, although the "people have a right to instruct their delegates ... the instructions will have a moral rather than a legal force" (p. 227). More generally, see pp. 123–27.

In most such situations, the delegates informally and consensually agree to the temporary elevation of one their number as leader for the purpose of organizing the convention.¹⁴ But this was not the case here. Ignoring Church’s attempt to claim the floor, James Allen offered his own motion:

Gentlemen of the Convention: I desire to put in nomination Col. John Dement, of Lee county, as temporary President of this Convention. This is that gentleman’s third term of service as a member of a Constitutional Convention, and I think that such an honorable experience is sufficient reason to justify conferring on him the honor of temporarily presiding over this body.¹⁵

After Charles McDowell seconded his motion, Allen immediately called a vote:

Gentlemen: As many as are of opinion that Col. John Dement, of Lee, be elected temporary President of this Convention, will say Aye. [“Aye!” “Aye!” and applause.] Those of the contrary opinion, will say No. [“No!” “No!” and confusion.]

Allen then summarily announced, “The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it. [Applause and confusion.]” This rather preemptory proclamation would have seemed to have given Dement the ¹⁴The most common practice in the nineteenth century appears to have been the unanimous selection of the oldest delegate for this post. That practice ostensibly encourages the appointment of a neutral and experienced leader, someone who no longer harbors personal political ambitions and yet generally knows how custom and tradition have operated in the past. In 1891, for example, the Montana Legislative Assembly rather tersely reported that “Mr. C.P. Blakeley being the oldest member present took the Chair”; House Journal of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana (Helena: Journal Publishing, 1891), 5. At the beginning of the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention in 1853, “Robert Rantoul, of Beverly, senior member of the Convention and a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1820, called the Convention to order” and subsequently temporarily served as presiding officer; Official Report of the Debates and Proceedings in the State Convention, Assembled May 4th, 1853, to Revise and Amend the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts (Boston: White & Potter, 1853), vol. 1, 7. Similarly, Thomas W. Powell was unanimously chosen as president pro tempore of the 1873 Ohio Constitutional Convention because he was “the oldest member of this body”; Debates and Proceedings of the Third Constitutional Convention of Ohio (Cleveland: W. S. Robison, 1873), vol. 1, 2. However, most records do not give the reason why the temporary presiding officer was chosen, although most were chosen unanimously. In some instances, the secretary of state or some officer filled that post until the chamber could be formally organized.

¹⁵Dement had previously served as a delegate in both the 1847 and 1862 Constitutional Conventions.

post. However, Church immediately responded by calling a vote on the nomination he had made.

Gentlemen: As many as are in favor of Hon. Wm. Cary for temporary President of this Convention will say Aye. [“Aye!” “aye!” “aye!” and applause.] The contrary, No. [“No!” “no!” and applause and laughter. “Cary!” “Cary!” “Dement!” “Dement!”]

Although the record does not show that Church summarily pronounced his own candidate to have been elected, we can safely assume that was what happened. In any event, the two nominees ascended opposite sides of the podium. Dement went up the stairs “from the democratic (south) side of the hall,” while Cary went up “from the republican (north) side of the hall.” When they met at the presiding officer’s chair, “they shook hands amid great laughter and applause.”¹⁶

Dement and Cary had been sponsored by their respective party contingents: Dement by the Democrats and Cary by the Republicans. In nominating them for the post of temporary president of the convention, Allen and Church had played the role of spokesmen for their respective parties. All the delegates of course recognized that was the subtext for their actions, thereby partially legitimating what they had done. For example, Church’s nomination of Cary was not viewed as arrogant effrontery but as collective audacity on the part of his party. Allen’s response was similarly interpreted but from the perspective of the opposite party. However, that subtext and the obvious good humor with which the delegates enjoyed the spectacle should not blind us to the fact that this was a collision of wills unmediated by any consensual understanding as to what constituted the rules of the game. When Dement and Cary shook hands at the rostrum, neither one of them had been appointed temporary leader of the convention.

Lawrence Church once again proposed a solution to the assembly’s dilemma.

Presidents—I say Messrs. Presidents, for there is some doubt in the minds of the members of the Convention as to who should be addressed by me as President. In order that this question may be settled, and settled, too, in such manner as gentlemen in deliberation should settle such questions, I move that there be a division of this Convention, and than none except members of the Convention vote; and, therefore, that those in favor of Hon. Wm. Cary for temporary President take the north side of the hall, and those in favor of Hon. John Dement take the south side of the hall, and that Hon. Milton Hay and Hon. John Scholfield be appointed tellers to ascertain which has the larger number. With that, all, I suppose, will be content.

There are several aspects of Church’s motion that deserve attention. First, although he, along with the rest of the delegates, understood that neither of the two “presidents” had been formally elected to the post, he appealed to them for recognition because, under the circumstances, that was all he or anyone else could do. The assembly absolutely required a leader in order to proceed with the organization, and if Dement and Cary were not to play that role, the delegates would be thrown back into the same quandary from which they had just emerged. So Church was now appealing to them for recognition where, originally, he had audaciously just stood up and announced his motion. Second, he had moved that the assembly vote on the two nominee-presidents, dividing up the hall into Republicans and Democrats. This proposal simultaneously recognized the quasi-authority of the two nominee-presidents (in that Church was asking them to permit him to offer this motion) and impeached that authority (by tacitly admitting that neither of them legitimately occupied their position without an election).

Third, Church had implicitly acknowledged that almost all the delegates in the chamber possessed a partisan political identity that strongly structured their orientation toward the proceedings, deeply informed how they interpreted the parliamentary situation, and, at the same time, appeared to promise a solution to the opening dilemma of the convention.¹⁷ Finally, Church “supposed” that all the other delegates would be “content” with his proposal because consensus would solve all the procedural contradictions attending this highly irregular, from any parliamentary perspective, proceeding. In fact, consensual understandings are the routine method for resolving the opening dilemma in democratic institutions, and this situation, although far more complicated than most, was no more pregnant with procedural contradictions than any other.

However, James Allen was not about to concede the initiative to Church, declaring:

Mr. President: The gentleman is out of order. I think it is too late for the gentleman to call for a division, inasmuch as the division was not demanded until after the presiding officer had taken his place at the desk.

Here, Allen first declared Church to be “out of order,” a phrase describing an action that violates parliamentary rules. However, the phrase presumed that rules had been adopted, which, of course, had not yet happened. Even if they had been adopted, the convention lacked, as we have seen, a presiding officer who could decide whether the point of order was correct. By his use of the singular “president,” Allen was clearly asking Dement, his nominee for the post, to rule on his point of order.¹⁸ And when he said that “it is too late” for a division, he also clearly implied that Dement had already been elected president of the convention. Underlying all of this is Allen’s expectation (or, more likely, hope) that Dement would now step forward to the podium and claim the office by declaring Church to be “out of order.” If Dement had done this, there would have been, of course, no reason for the Republicans to have respected his ¹⁷The vast majority of all conventions and legislative organizations avoid the opening dilemma by relying on strong party identifications and an obvious partisan majority in the chamber. That combination permits the majority party caucus to resolve the opening dilemma by agreeing upon a temporary or permanent presiding officer before formal proceedings begin in the chamber. While the opening dilemma is pragmatically avoided in this manner, the majority party is actually imposing its decision by fiat. As Sen notes, “when people cluster in parties,” the likelihood that Arrow’s paradox will appear also goes down dramatically (Sen, “The Possibility of Social Choice,” 355). However, when no partisan majority exists, no party can impose their resolution of the dilemma upon the rest of the chamber.

¹⁸A little later that day, Allen, in fact, stated that he believed “the gentleman from Lee [Mr. Dement] was properly elected temporary President of this Convention,” because after he (Allen) had “announced” the result of the vote, no one had “asked for a division, according to parliamentary law.” As we have seen, this was a rather self-serving interpretation of what had actually happened.

construction of the situation. The result might have been pandemonium within the chamber if the Republicans contested the Democratic coup d’état. Alternatively, the Republicans might simply have bolted the convention. But, whatever happened, the opening dilemma was not going to be resolved in that way.

However, the two nominee-presidents had evidently been discussing the situation up on the rostrum. Dement now stepped forward to the “president’s desk” and pleaded for harmony.¹⁹ It was now Cary’s turn to speak:

Gentlemen of the Convention: I cordially acquiesce in the remarks which have fallen from my honorable competitor, Colonel John Dement, of Lee county; and I suggest that the roll be called, or a division be had, as mentioned by the gentleman from McHenry [Mr. Church], and I will be satisfied with the result, be it as it may.

By aligning himself with Church and Cary, Dement clearly undercut Allen’s ostensible role as spokesman for the Democratic party. Allen’s objection now appeared entirely personal, inasmuch as Dement, the intended beneficiary of that objection, refused his assistance. By nominating him as the Democratic candidate for temporary president, Allen had recognized Dement’s authority as a significant figure in the Democratic ranks, if not his party’s leader in the chamber. Dement had now used whatever authority he had to oppose Allen’s objection. But more importantly, because we might otherwise overlook the fundamentals of this situation, Dement and Cary were collectively claiming the role of temporary president(s) of the convention. They could not have made this claim had they disagreed. But by concurring, they could go a long way toward establishing their own legitimacy, even if that legitimacy was limited to the mere taking of a single vote. Since their authority ultimately rested upon the saliency of party identities as a structuring feature of the assembly, their ability to suggest that a consensus existed with respect to a division of the assembly once again demonstrated that party alignments within the chamber had to be taken into account.

2.1 The Convention Roll

The delegates seemed to have warmly embraced the proposal for a division, and many of them yelled, “Call the roll.” Lawrence Church formalized this request, saying, “Let the roll be called,” and adding, “I ask for the yeas and nays.” In response, the delegates called out “ayes and noes, ayes and noes.” However, just as the delegates were readying themselves for the vote, Allen again sought the attention of the presiding officer: “Mr. President....” At the same time, the temporary secretary of the convention began the roll, calling out “John Abbott—.”²⁰ Allen persisted and then objected to a roll call vote because: “We ¹⁹The president’s desk or its equivalent must always be occupied whenever a legislative institution is in session. When a chamber is properly organized, it is thus both a physical space and theoretical necessity. In this situation, however, the president’s desk was simply a piece of furniture that served to orient the attention of the prospective (not yet formally recognized) delegates as they debated their predicament. Dement, when he stepped forward to the president’s desk, was no more eligible to occupy that space than anyone else in the chamber (or, put more generally, anyone else in the world at large).

²⁰The reader may well wonder where this temporary secretary came from. As with all convention officers, he had to be elected by the assembly and, thus far, the assembly had not even been able to elect the temporary president who would subsequently preside over the election of the other officers. The temporary secretary, George H. Harlow of Tazewell county, had thus not been elected at this point in the proceedings but was already, evidently with the tacit consent of the delegates, serving in that capacity. Otherwise, there would have been no one to record their deliberations or, in the present moment, call have no other means, in our present condition, of taking the vote of the Convention except by tellers.”

Given what we can surmise from the subsequent course of the convention’s deliberations, Allen was apparently objecting to a recorded vote because the convention roll had not yet been approved. He evidently did not want a recorded vote because it would imply that the convention roll, whatever it might be, had been approved, and at least from his perspective, there might have been something or someone on that roll that he might have wanted to change. Because a division of the chamber in which tellers simply counted the delegates on each side of the question would not have involved approval of the roll, Allen wanted the chamber to use that method of voting.²¹

From our perspective, however, the situation again displays the theoretically irresolvable qualities of the opening dilemma. The convention simply did not have a recognized membership that could legitimately do the voting, regardless of whether the delegates were simply counted or their names were individually called. A division of the chamber partially veiled the dilemma by making it seem as if the members “naturally knew” who had membership standing and who did not and thus would have exercised social pressure or some other device to prevent those from participating who were ineligible to vote. But the bottom line is that in the initial organization of the democratic assembly, as is the case for all democratic assemblies, there was simply no method for determining who was eligible to serve as a member.

Allen appears to have temporarily won this point, and the assembly was now preparing to vote for temporary president by tellers. However, Dement raised the leadership question once again. Standing at the president’s desk with Cary right beside him, Dement made light of their predicament:

There is an embarrassing question before the Chair—the question of who has the right to put the question. [Laughter.]²²

In formal parliamentary terms, he was, of course, correct; the assembly did not yet have an acknowledged presiding officer who could put the question to the delegates. However, the social situation very strongly implied that, if Dement and Cary worked together, the delegates would follow their lead. At this point, one of the delegates, Milton Hay, suggested that for the sake of harmony and peace, that the gentleman at the Secretary’s desk be allowed to read the roll; and that the Convention hear the roll which he has made up.²³

the roll. The record was subsequently “back-dated” by giving Harlow a title and office at a point in the proceedings when, in fact, he possessed neither one.

²¹Church had apparently changed his mind about a division of the chamber (in which the delegates would have been merely counted without recording their individual votes) and was now requesting a recorded vote in which individual positions would be set down in the convention journal. While the situation is not entirely clear, Church apparently wanted a formal roll call in which the names of the prospective delegates would be individually called because it would serve to buttress their otherwise uncertain claims to their seats.

²²Given what was at stake in the organization of the convention, the delegates were remarkably good-humored. Their laughter apparently arose, in part, out of an embarrassment they all felt as they were compelled to recognize their inability to deal with what must have seemed, at least in their past experience, with utterly mundane matters of parliamentary housekeeping. They might have also felt some anxiety that a misstep or two might have doomed the entire convention.

²³The “gentleman at the Secretary’s desk” was a more accurate way of naming George H. Harlow, the yet-to-be-elected convention officer referred to in a previous note.

Church immediately backed Hay’s suggestion: “Let us hear the roll.”

This “roll” was a copy of a list of delegates compiled from the official election returns received from the counties. The list had been prepared by the Illinois secretary of state and then given to the convention. In many situations where a state constitutional convention or lower chamber of a legislature was initially organized, such a list served as a temporary membership list until the assembly could determine for itself who would or would not be a member. It should be stressed that this list had no more authority or standing in any convention or assembly than what the delegates wished to give it. Onias Skinner, one of the delegates opposed to using this list, succinctly summarized the limits of the secretary’s role:

The duty of the Secretary of State is this, and no more; to attend at the opening of the body; to furnish the body with such documents, paper, stationery, etc., as the delegates may require. He has no power to present a roll for the government of this body in any respect whatever.... He has no power to come here with his roll, and say, A, B, and C are delegates to this Convention. The roll in his possession has no more vitality than simply an abstract copy of record in the county court, which is filed in his office and preserved as a mere duplicate.

While Skinner was undoubtedly correct, there was simply no way for the assembly to determine for itself who would or would not be a member.²⁴ Simply put, one of the preconditions for that determination was that the assembly formally recognize who should vote on the determination, a precondition that threatened to tie up the assembly in an infinite regress.²⁵

The convention secretary then read the list of delegates for the information of the assembly. This, however, was not the same thing as a calling of the roll, in which members would be asked to respond to their names. Such a call would constitute a major step toward determining who was a member of the convention because those whose names were not called would then have to establish their credentials another way. After the list had been read, Church moved that the roll be formally called and asked the delegates who favored calling the roll to answer “aye” and those who opposed to respond “no.” The record states that the “vote was accordingly taken,” apparently solely on Church’s initiative. Immediately after the vote, Church declared that the “ayes have it.” However, many of the delegates disagreed, yelling out “no, no.”

Having encountered intense opposition, the whole proceeding fell to the floor, and the assembly again was at a stalemate. John Dement once more stepped into the breach:

Let me remark to the Convention that it seems to have no other officers selected from this honorable body to preside on this very momentous occasion, than the Hon. Mr. Cary and myself. We are perfectly willing ²⁴Although the Illinois secretary of state had clearly played an important role in stipulating the place and time of the convention, he could not intervene in its decisions once it had met. The secretary of state was thus powerless to determine who belonged in the convention because, once the delegates had gathered together, they were free to organize their assembly however they wished. If the delegates had agreed to use the list prepared by the secretary of state to determine the membership of the convention, it would have been useful in bridging the opening dilemma. However, if the list met opposition from a sizable number of delegates, it could not have served that purpose. Hoar, Constitutional Conventions, 170.

²⁵The assembly could not vote on a motion to determine their membership because that vote would require that they already had determined their membership in order to know who was qualified to vote.

that the questions that are propounded to the Chair shall be announced to the Convention by us, alternately, and in that way this matter can be easily settled.

This proposal prompted Elijah Haines to suggest an alternative method of creating a convention roll:

I am a member [of the convention], for I have a certificate to that effect. I make this suggestion, then (and I think it is the only one that can be made), that our certificates be all handed up to these two gentlemen [Dement and Cary]; that a roll be prepared by them, and that the members entered upon that roll proceed to select a temporary President.

The certificates to which Haines referred had been issued by the county or counties that composed the districts from which the delegates had been elected. The delegates (or at least most of them) had carried these certificates to Springfield, and Haines was suggesting that they now be turned over to nominee-presidents for the purpose of constructing a convention roll. This proposal would thus have sidestepped the mediating role of the Illinois secretary of state, although the information on the certificates in the possession of the delegates should have been identical (or nearly so) to the election returns reported by the Illinois secretary of state.

At this point, Skinner raised three issues that seemed to him to counsel against a speedy organization. The first was that “some claiming their seats in this Convention, as delegates, are not upon [the secretary of state’s] list.” For that reason, the list could not be used as a temporary roll because it was incomplete. The second was that some of the delegates had not yet arrived in Springfield. He urged that the organization be postponed until all of them had arrived and could participate in the proceedings. Finally (and rather technically), he said that opening the convention at 2:00 in the afternoon was an arbitrary interpretation of the law. While that law designated December 13, 1869, as the day the convention should assemble, it did not say at what hour on that day the convention should assemble. In all this, Skinner was clearly speaking as a Democratic partisan. He felt that a postponement would allow the party to realize its full strength within the assembly, and when it did, the roll could be perfected to the best advantage of his party.

However, Skinner himself had informally agreed to 2:00 as the hour for opening the convention. Lawrence Church must have thus been a little taken aback, as he pointed out that the time had been selected in response to “a special request of the gentleman and his friends.” Henry Bromwell, like Church a Republican, then entered a full explanation into the convention record.

If the President will permit, I will say in response to the gentleman, the idea of convening at two o’clock arose in this manner: The gentleman from Crawford [James Allen, a Democrat] and myself, talked about an hour, and suggested to each other that some hour should be fixed; and we agreed, at first, that it should be three o’clock, and see who wanted it at that hour. We talked to half dozen or so, and it was suggested that the days were so short—three o’clock being pretty near dark—that two o’clock would be better; and we agreed to that, and everybody fell in with it, until perhaps thirty or forty had been spoken to on both sides of the Convention. That is all there was of that, so far as the time was concerned.

So the time had been informally agreed upon prior to the opening of the convention and had been set by consensus in a discussion heavily structured by partisan identities. If Skinner now impeached the legitimacy of that informal agreement, he was implicitly attacking either the integrity or good sense of his own party colleagues. But this apparently did not deter him, for he replied that “these gentlemen [had no authority] to make their arrangement among themselves, consulting with whomever they may happen to find hanging around the hall of the State house, in one office or another, or in this room.”

Because there were eighty-five delegates in the convention, the consultation among “thirty or forty” of them had actually been quite inclusive. And, if Church had correctly stated that Skinner himself had requested that time, Skinner’s objection was both rather tardy and uncollegial.²⁶ However, we should not overlook the point that no one could invoke an authority, other than this informal agreement, for designating 2:00 as the hour for opening the convention. On that point Skinner was entirely correct.

But Skinner was already embarked on a tactic that he hoped would gain his side the time they needed. And Church recognized it for exactly what it was: a filibuster.

If the gentleman will indicate about what time it is necessary for him to speak, we will proceed with the calling of the roll, and let him at the same time go on. It has been suggested to me that there is a limit to the length of time which a gentleman, claiming to be a delegate, may speak.

The problem here was that the assembly had not adopted formal parliamentary rules, and there was thus no means of shutting off debate. So Church was suggesting that Skinner, if he so wished, could continue to address the assembly while the roll was called. For their part, the Republicans were ready to concede what appeared to be a major stumbling block: Church, as the party spokesman, thus proposed “that the name which is said [by the Democrats] to have been omitted from the roll be inserted therein, and that the business go forward.”

Skinner ignored Church’s offer and launched into a long harangue in which he repeated, again and again, that the secretary of the state had no authority to even offer a list of delegates to the convention and that the doors to the chamber had been “swung open” at 2:00 p.m. in utter disregard for the rights of the delegates to the convention.²⁷ Although he did not admit that he was simply playing for time, Skinner urged that the convention “should now adjourn until tomorrow at twelve o’clock meridian.”²⁸ Presumably, he would have yielded the floor for that purpose, but no one stepped forward to take up his suggestion. Although we might consider his rhetoric a little overheated, Skinner did justify his request in language that accurately referenced the central core of the convention’s legitimacy: its direct and unmediated

²⁶At one point, Skinner described the decision to open the convention doors at 2:00 p.m. as “fraudulent” and part of “a determined and preconcerted plan,” adding “I enter my protest against this whole machinery, from beginning to end, of carrying out a preconcerted scheme, of seizing, irrevocably, upon power in the absence of others who are soon to be here, and which affects their rights.” Note that the “scheme” to which Skinner refers is only important because the convention had not yet organized and, thus, had no accepted means of making ritually proper and respected decisions. If the convention were organized, such a scheme would merely be an acceptable strategy pursued by political actors, working within and with full knowledge of the parliamentary procedures (and thus opportunities) open to them and their opponents.

²⁷At no point did Skinner suggest how the ostensible delegates could have decided when the doors should have been “flung open” before the convention actually met. Like formal recognition of the members, this decision involved an infinite regress if Skinner’s objection had prevailed.

²⁸This was, perhaps, the most logically inconsistent passage in his remarks. By proposing that the convention adjourn, Skinner was offering a motion to a convention that he otherwise insisted did not yet exist.

connection to the popular will. Referring to the members of both parties who had struck the informal agreement on time, Skinner charged that:

You present to an intelligent world, palpably and fairly—and you cannot avoid the consequence, you cannot conceal the fact from the good people of Illinois and the civilized world—this spectacle of an attempt at seizure upon, and organization of, a Convention of the people of the State of Illinois, based upon the bargain of three or four, five or six individuals; based upon the action of the Secretary of State, without the color of law.

The problem with all this, of course, is that Skinner had nothing to offer as an alternative beyond adjournment to the next day. And the time he set for opening the convention on that day was even more arbitrary, because it reflected only his own personal will—a will made extraordinarily powerful because he held the floor and would not give it up.

Still, there might have been something to his request in that there were delegates who, for one reason or another (including misinformation as to when the convention would open), had not yet arrived in Springfield. Westel Sedgwick, one of the Republican delegates, rose to the occasion:

I ask the gentleman how he knows the delegates are not all here? The roll has not been called, and the presumption is that they are here.

Sedgwick was, of course, suggesting that Skinner was protecting the rights of phantoms. If all the delegates were, in fact, in the chamber, then there would be no harm in proceeding. The problem, from Skinner's perspective, was that the method of determining whether all the delegates were in the chamber (i.e., calling the roll) was the very thing he wanted to prevent.

Skinner simply answered Sedgwick by saying, "The presumption is that, according to all human experience, they are not here." He then continued his harangue, again with the evident purpose of filibustering the proceedings. Here, too, Skinner reminded his colleagues of the rather unusual position in which they were placed. If they were to make an error in the organization, there would be "no appeal" to a higher authority because there was, with reference to the state of Illinois, no higher authority than the constitutional convention itself. And, "as there is no remedy, and you [referring to the Republicans] have the power" to effect a partisan organization and thus "can effect a revolution [in which] to carry out your preconcerted plans—you are invulnerable, because there is no power but the great Jehovah can avert the consequences." This would be "a revolution, according to the understanding of mankind. And if you can consummate it, make the revolution effectual—then there is no remedy." Once more, Skinner's rhetoric is perhaps overblown but still rested on a fundamental recognition that a state of nature existed within the bounds of a constitutional convention, a state of nature that did not admit and could not admit of any higher authority than what would be created within it.²⁹

²⁹Constitutional conventions are very similar to the initial "states of nature" postulated in the social contract theories of Hobbes, Rousseau, and Locke, in that the problem is to provide for the voluntary acquiescence of a people to the creation of a state. For that acquiescence to be voluntary, the people (or their representatives in this case) must be free of all coercive pressure or influence. In what became the United States, this interpretation dates back to the origin of constitutional conventions in the period after the Declaration of Independence when the colonial charters were "suspended the moment the colonies declared their independence" and "the colonies reverted to a state of nature." In crafting a new constitution, a colony sought "to emerge from this state of nature and organize a new social contract." Hoar, Constitutional Conventions, 1–10, 26–27.

In the midst of Skinner's observations on revolution and Jehovah, James Allen asked if he might "interrupt a moment." Allen then brought the filibuster back to Earth by identifying the crux of the problem and offering a solution:

It seems there are some errors on this roll. I desire to propose to the gentlemen of this Convention an adjournment until some hour tomorrow. And we ask that the two gentlemen (laughter) prepare a corrected list of the members sent to the Convention, so that they may present it. We are anxious to have a speedy organization.

Because he, like Skinner, was a Democrat, Allen was probably speaking for the both of them and other party colleagues as well. And, like Church previously, he seized on the quasi-leader roles of the "two gentlemen," Dement and Cary, as possibly effecting a compromise by asking them to jointly correct the list of delegates provided by the Illinois secretary of state. In the meantime, the convention would adjourn until the next day.

Church responded for the Republicans by stating that he favored, as consistent with the "forms of law," an alternative method of correcting the roll in which the roll-call would have proceeded. Any gentleman who is not upon the list would have been placed upon it, and our temporary organization would have been effected; and then, if adjournment should have been required to further the organization of the Convention, of course we would have been governed by the circumstances. All we ask is, that we may effect a temporary organization, and not be here to lag and mope away the day, but act like reasonable men.

In the course of his remarks, Church deplored the way in which Skinner had characterized the Illinois secretary of state, who "should be treated with proper respect" and termed Skinner's harangue a "factious interruption . . . made for what purpose we cannot conceive."

Allen and Church had thus offered two alternative methods of creating a temporary roll of delegates. In some ways, the two methods appeared to be very similar in that they would both use the Illinois secretary of state's list as a template and would consensually correct mistakes on that list. But there was a very important difference between them that meant everything in terms of party interests in the convention. Allen's method would allow the convention plenary authority, through its two quasi-leaders, to construct the roll. Because the Illinois secretary of state's list would be nothing more than a convenient starting point for this construction, there might be substitutions in which one man claiming to be a delegate would be displaced by another. Church's method, on the other hand, would have conferred much more legitimacy upon the Illinois secretary of state's list by making it prima facie evidence that a particular man should be considered a member-elect. If the right of a man to a seat at the convention were challenged, it was not entirely clear what would happen because Church had himself talked about corrections. But normal practice, in state and national legislatures, was to note the challenge and give those men their seats until the challenges could be resolved. Since the parties were so closely balanced in the convention and because most of the challenges would be made by Democrats, the Democrats feared that Church's method would advantage the opposition. From our perspective, however, this possible partisan advantage is rather unimportant. What is more significant is that these two alternatives were equally arbitrary in that, despite Church's appeal to the "forms of law," there was simply no way to confer more legitimacy upon one, as opposed to the other. The opening dilemma was thus just as firmly ensconced as it ever was.

When Skinner charged that the Republican proposal was politically motivated, Church answered:

We [the Republicans] have no partisan object to accomplish by pressing this matter. But we repeat that the hour of two o'clock was the hour, as every one, I suppose, knows, arranged for our meeting, with the concurrence of all parties. And now I will suggest that this body adjourn until tomorrow morning at ten o'clock. This is proposed with the understanding that this opposition [evidently referring to Skinner's filibuster] will be withdrawn, and that no further embarrassment will be offered to the organization of this Convention.

Church was thus acceding to Allen's request for an adjournment while attaching conditions. However, there was still no apparent agreement on a method for constructing a roll.³⁰

Stating that he wanted to make an explanation, Allen admitted that "I did agree with my friend here [Mr. Bromwell] that the hour of two o'clock was a very convenient time for us to get together," thus confirming that a consensus on time had been reached between the parties. He then explained that the Democrats had, just after the convention opened, "received a telegraphic dispatch from a member elect, that owing to the severe illness of his father he had not been able to leave [home]. He will probably be here tonight or tomorrow." So, in fact, one of the motives behind Skinner's filibuster was merely to delay the proceedings until this person arrived.

At this point Samuel Hayes, one of the Democratic delegates, rose and summarized the situation in which convention found itself. Since his summary closely conforms to the state of nature interpretation of the convention, it is worth a glance or two. After discussing the various kinds of evidence that might document the election of a delegate, Hayes launched into a broad theoretical description of just what the assembly was when it made a constitution.

I hold the doctrine that the people of the State of Illinois are sovereign, within the limitations of the Constitution of the United States, and that they have the right, within the limitations of that constitution, to frame and remodel their organic law. I hold that the power cannot be taken away from them by representatives of the people who are elected merely to pass ordinary acts of legislation, and I therefore hold that it is incompetent for the Legislature to restrict the representatives of the people elected to frame the organic law, in regard either to the mode of their organization or to the extent of their power after they have been organized....

I hold, then, that while the Secretary of State is bound to attend upon the proceedings of the Convention—the law requiring him to do so—the Convention is the only judge of the election returns and qualifications of its members—and I think that gentlemen of all parties will agree to that proposition.

When we meet together in this hall, we are only prima facie members of the Convention. We meet here and recognize one another as persons who are presumed to be members of the Constitutional Convention. We generally have no difficulty in selecting a temporary President, for the reason that the office of the temporary President is merely to secure the regular organization of the Convention, by presiding over its proceedings, and securing the vote of those who appear to be members.

While this was a particularly lucid analysis of the situation, executed at a high level of abstraction, Hayes did little more than confirm that the assembly was still securely lodged in the opening dilemma. Acknowledging the sovereignty of the convention over its own proceedings merely indicated that the convention alone was responsible for resolving that dilemma.³¹

2.2 Election of the Temporary President

When Hayes sat down, however, the partisan stalemate began to break up. First, Thomas Turner, one of the Democrats in the assembly, stated his belief (formed "after consulting with a number of the members") that "there is but one error in the Secretary [of state]'s list." If the delegates were to "consent that his name be called," the Democrats would be willing to proceed to elect a temporary president because "every gentleman is [now] present whom we have any reasonable cause to suppose will be present within the next two or three days."

Turner's suggestion appears to assume that the member or members the Democrats had been waiting for had already arrived.³² The only other obstacle in creating a convention roll was the status of this one member from Du Page County, who, although he had the proper certificate of election in hand, did not appear on the secretary of state's list. Suggesting that he himself had offered to place that delegate's name on the roll much earlier in the proceedings, Church immediately agreed to this solution and the Republicans were on board. The assembly then immediately proceeded to call the roll, as corrected, with each of the delegates announcing as they responded whom they favored for the post of temporary president. As they voted, some of the Republicans explained that they were voting for John Dement out of deep respect for his long service to the state, including membership in the 1847 and 1862 Constitutional Conventions. Other Republican delegates evidently abstained on this vote as well. As a result, Dement easily defeated Cary, 44 to 32, and was subsequently escorted to the president's chair.

After the newly elected temporary president gave a short speech, the convention turned to the election of a convention secretary. Here the partisan balance in the convention was starkly evident as the Democratic nominee, Harmon G. Reynolds, and the Republican candidate, George H. Harlow, tied at 42 votes apiece. Two delegates, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, then rose and offered motions that the nominees be considered "temporary secretary" and "temporary assistant secretary” of the convention.³³ This suggestion was approved, and the convention then elected two temporary doorkeepers, one from each party, as well.

³¹As another delegate put it somewhat later in the proceedings, "This Convention is in an inchoate condition. No person here has proven his right to a seat. It is not officially known who are entitled to them. It is not officially known how many other gentlemen are here to contest our claims to seats in this Convention. We are not yet a legal body. We are simply eighty-five gentlemen claiming to be members elect, and by courtesy conceding in advance that each can show and make good his title to membership." On the conception of sovereignty with respect to constitutional conventions generally, see Hoar, Constitutional Conventions, 80, 90, 133–34, 170–74.

³²Later that day Skinner explained "that my remarks, made this afternoon, were offered on behalf of absentees, who were on the train coming in, and whatever I said was for their benefit; and I was very much relieved when it was announced to me that several of them had arrived."

2.3 Oath of Office

Now that temporary convention officers had been installed, the assembly turned to the task of formally recognizing the prospective delegates as members of the convention. In many legislative bodies and constitutional conventions, members are confirmed by taking an oath of office. The oath simultaneously performs two functions. On the one hand, the member must step forward and voluntarily take the oath, thereby symbolically demonstrating that the member is willing to serve. On the other, eligibility to take the oath confirms that the assembly recognizes the delegate as having all the rights, obligations, and privileges of membership. Like everything else in a constitutional convention, the assembly has total control over the form that the oath will take. In this instance, Lawrence Church proposed that the oath take the following form:

You do solemnly swear to support the Constitution of the United States, and of this State, and to faithfully discharge the duties of your office as members of the Convention. So help you God.

This oath may seem almost completely ordinary and thus devoid of controversy. But it was not.

After the clerk had read Church’s resolution, James Allen immediately rose and moved to strike the words “and of this State” from the oath. The reasons he gave for this motion go to the very heart of the state of nature in which the convention deliberated.

I do not see how we are very well to alter and amend our Constitution, or any provision of our Constitution, while taking an oath to support its provisions. I move to strike out “and of this State” from the resolution, so that the oath may be taken to support the Constitution of the United States and faithfully discharge our duties.

In sum, Allen was contending that no one could support the existing Illinois State Constitution and also, at the same time, be engaged in a collective effort to replace that constitution with a new document. As he put it,

It ... would be an absurdity for us to take the oath solemnly to observe the provisions of the Constitution of the State, while we are engaged in taking to pieces that Constitution and substituting something else for it.

Anticipating what would turn out to be the Republican position on this issue, Allen also said that he was “aware that the [Illinois] Legislature has prescribed the oath which this body should take, but not believing that the Legislature had power to prescribe the form of oath to be administered to the members of this body, I make this motion to strike out.”

Church rejected Allen’s interpretation by contending that their collective task to “revise, alter or amend the Constitution of Illinois” was, in fact, a process entirely framed by that same constitution.

³³This is the election in which Harlow, who had already been serving as de facto secretary of the convention, was formally elected to that post. It is not clear from the record whether he served as temporary secretary or temporary assistant secretary.

Though we are here to take to pieces, examine, correct and revise that instrument, we are here to do it in a method pointed out by that instrument, holding our power and authority from that instrument, and from a law made in pursuance and protection of it, under which law we are required to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States, also that of the State of Illinois, and also the usual oath of office, to discharge our duties here.

Church’s position thus had two parts. The most important was that they could only change the constitution within a process authorized and set out within that constitution. In other words, the constitution both anticipated and sanctioned the process in which they would amend it. They were thus acting in accord with its provisions even as they changed those provisions. He also noted that the state legislature, in calling the convention together, had specified this oath for its delegates and they were thus bound by law to use it. Church rejected the notion that they were a revolutionary body, resorting to first principles,—the elementary right of revolution,—but are simply here as a legally constituted body, acting under a properly constituted power.

If they had gathered together to change the state constitution outside the color of law, they would be making revolution, and thus swearing an oath to support the state constitution would be a complete and utter contradiction. But, because this was an ordinary process, fully enjoying the sanction and drawing upon the authority of the state, the oath he offered was perfectly consistent with their obligations and responsibilities.

Henry Bromwell agreed with his Republican colleague and drew a scenario for the delegates that would starkly contrast with the situation in which they found themselves.

We are not in the position of a body of men on an island, who should assemble, after being cast away in a storm, and attempt to lay the foundations of a government. Here the foundations are laid. The Constitution is made. The machinery of the State government goes forward. In that machinery it is provided that whatever alterations or amendments may be desired, shall be made in a certain manner, in a manner conformable to certain laws, in a mode pointed out and ordered beforehand.

One difference between the position Allen assumed and the Republican interpretation drew upon what would happen if the convention were to fail to adopt a new constitution. All three men clearly recognized that, if the convention were to fail, the people of Illinois would not revert to a state of nature because the current state government would remain legitimate, with all its powers still in force and all its officials exercising its authority. For Church and Bromwell, this fact was proof positive, along with the clear sanction for their actions by the state, that they were well within the ambit of the state constitution as they deliberated.

Allen clearly accepted the premises but rejected the conclusion. For him, the delegates would step into a state of nature, albeit limited, when they began to deliberate. They could thus appropriately swear an oath to the national constitution because that charter was not suspended as they deliberated. In fact, one of the constraints under which they would work was that nothing they adopted could conflict with the United States Constitution. But the state constitution was necessarily suspended with respect to the delegates. While this suspension was very narrowly limited to their deliberative roles in the convention, they could not simultaneously deliberate on a constitutional revision and pretend, at the same time, that they were supporting the state constitution.³⁴

All three men also believed that, as Bromwell put it, the Illinois “Legislature is entirely powerless to prescribe the scope of our action when once [the constitutional convention] is assembled in due form.” But the Republican delegates emphasized that, once they were finished, the revised constitution would be submitted to the people of Illinois for approval in an election. That meant, for one thing, that their labors were provisional, not definitive. Furthermore, because the revised constitution would only come into being when and if the people voted their approval, the existing state constitution would still be in place once they adjourned. And, because that election would be held under Illinois law, the existing state constitution thus controlled both entry into (when and how the delegates were elected) and exit (popular approval of the revision) from the convention. To pretend otherwise, again in Bromwell’s words, was to “jump at once from the control and order of law into the wild field of anarchy, and say that we are unlimited in our powers.” If the convention were to adopt such an attitude, “society will be remitted to its first principles [and the delegates and the Illinois people] shall be but a step from barbarism.”

The prospect of a return to the state of nature clearly disturbed some of the delegates. The Republicans appear to have seized upon the oath as a way of preventing a potential slide into anarchy in that, if the delegates swore to support the state constitution, they would be at least committed to a postconvention process in which an election, sanctioned and overseen by the state legislature, would be required for ratification.³⁵ In other words, by swearing such an oath, the delegates would pledge to support the process of ratification currently set out in the existing state constitution. If they did not swear to support the state constitution, the delegates could possibly change that process by, for example, simply declaring their revision to be ratified before they adjourned. The oath proposed by the Republicans would thus constrain the decisions of the conventions before the delegates began to deliberate.³⁶ ³⁴Lest the reader conclude that this was an arcane distinction that possessed no vital substance, we should note that controversies over the construction of the oath occurred in numerous state constitutional conventions throughout the nineteenth century. Many of those controversies, in fact, turned on whether this precise clause should be included. Hoar, Constitutional Conventions, 189.

³⁵This debate indirectly raises a very important issue: If the people were allowed to vote on ratifying the new constitution, they might then, implicitly, decide whether or not the constitutional convention was legitimate. In effect, by voting to ratify the constitution, the people would be retroactively legitimating the convention that wrote it (that was, for example, the effect of the ratifying conventions for the United States Constitution). If we were to accept that rationale, the opening dilemma (and the democratic paradox) would lose much of its bite. However, we should not accept that rationale for two reasons. First, the people who might vote in such a ratification are as unauthorized as the agents who ostensibly represented them at the constitutional convention. The convention certainly defined “a people,” but that definition was not (and cannot be) derived democratically. It directly follows that the “people” defined by the convention is as unauthorized as the delegates who defined them. Second, a constitutional convention can simply declare that the new constitution is adopted without a referendum. That was, for example, a major issue in the long debate over the oath reported in the text. There is thus no way to guarantee that a constitutional convention will submit its text to the people, and, in fact, some conventions have not (perhaps the most notorious of these was the 1890 Mississippi Constitutional Convention).

³⁶The interpretation in the text is consistent with much of the debate on the convention floor. However, the Republicans also claimed that the state legislature could dictate the form of the oath. If so and if that form (specifically, the inclusion of the phrase “support the Constitution . . . of this State”) could constrain delegates as they deliberated, that might imply that the state legislature could dictate other aspects of the convention. Because the Republicans did not subscribe to that position, this would seem to involve them in a contradiction. The contradiction might have been resolved, however, if the Republicans had maintained that any change in the ratification process could only take

During this debate, the Democrats never said that they wanted to supersede the ratification process currently set out in the state constitution. What they did say, and said repeatedly, was that they could not honorably swear to support the state constitution and, at the same time, deliberate on its revision. In that sense, the two sides on this question were speaking past one another. Even so, the Democrats did seem to interpret the convention’s sovereignty much more expansively than did the Republicans. William Archer, for example, had also served in the 1847 Illinois Constitution Convention in which this very issue had been very fully and very elaborately discussed; and I know that it was the opinion of some of the most eminent jurists who held seats upon that floor that no oath at all was necessary—that that Convention was an elementary body, deriving its authority from no source; that absolute sovereignty and paramount authority were the attributes of such a body; that it owed allegiance to no person and no body of men; that it was, as it were, the people en masse, and that no oath at all was necessary.

The outcome of that debate in 1847 was that the delegates swore an oath that omitted any reference to the state constitution. Archer then concluded that the act of the people, in calling this Convention, is a resumption of power of government into their hands, and the election of delegates to this Convention is a transfer of that sovereignty to this body; and if it be sovereign, I am at a loss to know to what authority it is amenable, except to the Federal Constitution, to which, under God, every government, State and Federal, and all State Constitutions must conform.

While Archer did not explicitly say that the delegates could, in fact, legitimately specify a change in the process through which their new constitution would be adopted, there is clearly nothing in his position that would prevent such an assumption of authority. And that is what had the Republicans worried.

The debate over what the oath should entail and how it would be administered consumed several days.³⁷ At one point, one of the Democrats suggested a substitute for the oath Church had presented.

Resolved, That the delegates to this Convention take the following oath: “You do solemnly swear to support the Constitution of the United States, and faithfully discharge the duties of delegates to revise, alter or amend the Constitution of the State of Illinois.”

Because this would place determination of what “the duties of delegates” might be in the hands of the individual delegates, the substitute effectively evaded the question of whether or not the effect once the revised constitution had been approved by the people. However, while such an interpretation might have resolved the contradiction, it would have also made the oath they supported redundant because the delegates would have been constrained regardless. More generally, the presumption that the state legislature could dictate the oath would have contradicted the more general Republican position, shared by the Democrats, that no constraints could be imposed on the convention other than those agreed to by the delegates themselves. Although the arguments that the Republicans made involved a mass of contradictions, they nonetheless reflected the deep apprehension they felt if the convention were unconstrained.

³⁷In the midst of this debate, one of the delegates moved the adoption of the following resolution: “Resolved, That until a permanent organization of this Convention has been effected, and until otherwise provided, the rules of the Convention of 1862 to amend or revise the Constitution of the State of Illinois, be adopted as the rules of this Convention.” However, Dement ruled that the adoption of procedural rules was not a privileged question and that the convention should therefore continue its consideration of the oath. Thus, the convention was still deliberating without parliamentary rules at this time.

delegates would be pledged to support the state constitution. Nothing came of this suggestion.

Later on, the Mayflower Compact was alluded to in support of the Republican position.³⁸ At another point, one of the delegates presented a catalog of past state constitutional conventions in which he showed that many of them had required no oath at all.³⁹ After more debate, Thomas Turner moved that the convention “proceed to take the question” upon the alternative oath that had been offered as a substitute amendment. This motion was immediately seconded. After more debate, Orville Browning (the member who had previously said that he stood “outside of all party organizations”) offered yet another alternative oath:

That I will support the Constitution of the United States, and of the State so far as its provisions are compatible with, and applicable to my position and duties as a member of this Convention, and that I will faithfully discharge my duties as a member of said Convention.

The Democrats, possibly recognizing that the vote was going to be close and that Browning’s oath was little different from their own, accepted his version in place of their alternative. After much more debate, the convention finally voted, pitting Browning’s oath against the one originally offered by Church. Browning’s alternative prevailed, 44 to 40. The convention then adopted Browning’s oath as the one they would use to swear in the delegates. The assembly then adjourned.

On the next day, however, the delegates soon discovered that the controversy over the oath was not quite finished. James Allen suggested that the assembly might, by unanimous consent, allow delegates to choose to swear the oath the convention had adopted or, alternatively, the oath passed by the legislature. However, Charles Emmerson, a Republican objected, saying,

I must confess that the taking of a multiplicity of oaths does not look proper to me. It seems to me that when we organize we all should take an oath; and that every member should take the same oath, and not a number of different oaths.

This question was left in the air as the delegates, twelve at a time, came to the bar of the chamber and were sworn by Samuel H. Treat, a judge serving on the bench of the United States District Court for Southern Illinois. Then the question again reverted to the legislature’s oath. After much parliamentary maneuvering and debate, the convention decided to allow those delegates who desired to take the legislature’s oath, in addition to the convention oath, to rise in their places and be sworn by Judge Treat.⁴⁰

³⁸“It was said in old times, by way of burlesque, that there was one colony that came to New England that had not time to prepare their Constitution before they landed—and that it adopted a resolution that it would be governed by the laws of God until it could make better ones. [Laughter]....” The gist of this comment was that they did not need to resort to such desperate measures.

³⁹“In the Conventions of Maryland of 1776 and 1850; Tennessee, 1796 and 1834; Virginia, 1829 and 1850; Pennsylvania, 1789 and 1837; New York, 1821 and 1846; Massachusetts, 1779, 1821, and 1853; Michigan, 1850; Wisconsin, 1847; Louisiana, 1812, 1844 and 1852, no oath at all was administered to the members. In the Conventions of Pennsylvania, 1776; North Carolina, 1835; New Jersey, 1844; Missouri, 1845; Illinois, 1847 and 1862; California and Kentucky, 1849; Ohio and Indiana, 1850; Iowa and the two Minnesota Conventions of 1857, and Maryland, 1864, the members were sworn.” The delegate did not reveal what kind of oath had been sworn in the latter conventions. The delegate took this list almost verbatim from John Alexander Jameson, The Constitutional Convention: Its History, Powers, and Modes of Proceeding (New York: Charles Scribner, 1866), 269–70. Also see Hoar, Constitutional Conventions, 189, 230.

2.4 Election of a Permanent Convention President

Now that the delegates were sworn the convention had defined its membership. It also had a serviceable presiding officer in John Dement, the temporary president, and the assembly now turned its attention to the election of a permanent president. Charles Hitchcock, a Democrat, was subsequently elected with none of the existential angst that had accompanied some of the other stages in the assembly’s organization.⁴¹

2.5 Adoption of Procedural Rules

On the afternoon of the fourth day of the convention, the assembly finally adopted procedural rules. They came in the form of a resolution authorizing the appointment of a committee “to prepare and report rules for the government of this Convention.” Until that committee reported back to the assembly, the rules of the previous constitutional convention, held in 1862, were to be enforced. The following day, December 17, 1869, the Committee on Rules reported back to the convention. After debate, their proposed rules were adopted by voice vote.

3. Summary

One way to think about the relationship between the opening dilemma and the will of the people is to distinguish between (a) the clearly evident and empirically demonstrable existence of “individual wills” and (b) the metaphysical collective entity that democratic belief constructs when it refers to the sum of those individual wills as the “will of the people.” At one level, this is merely a terminological conceit in which the “will of the people” is rhetorically deployed. But on another and often more important level, the will of the people is explicitly manufactured out of the expression of individual wills. In order for that transformation to be legitimate in a democracy, we must first agree upon the algorithm that manufactures the metaphysical will of the people out of a set of individual wills. For example, we might simply count the individual wills with respect to a choice between two alternatives and decide that a majority is to be construed as the will of the people. That majority rule is probably the most commonly used algorithm in democratic practice.

The opening dilemma is more general in its implications because it demonstrates that the algorithm itself cannot be democratically chosen. In order to adopt an algorithm, the set of individual wills that are to be consulted must be defined, and paradoxically, defining that set of individual wills itself requires an algorithm. Put another way, at the very onset of the convening of a constitutional convention (and thus the founding of a ⁴⁰In effect, those who preferred the legislature’s oath were sworn in twice, once by the convention oath and again by the legislature’s oath. Although this portion of the debate is inconclusive, the question appears to have turned on the implications of an oath for the way in which the delegates would subsequently deliberate. If they were all sworn by the same oath (which they were with respect to the convention oath), then all the delegates were deliberating within the same context with respect to their constitutional obligations as delegates. However, by providing that the delegates could swear to the legislature’s oath as well, the convention seemed, at least to some delegates, to allow that oath to supersede the convention oath.

⁴¹Hitchcock was one of six delegates representing Cook County (containing Chicago) at the convention. Several of these delegates had “organized themselves into a bi-partisan ‘People’s Party’” and all of them had been elected under that auspices. Because the numbers aligned with the two major parties were almost tied in the convention, this “bi-partisan” delegation held the balance of power. It is not clear whether Hitchcock was a one of these delegates, but that would easily explain his election as president of the convention. Cornelius, A History of Constitution Making, 45.

Table 2. Stages in the Resolution of the Opening Dilemma in the 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention

1. Informal recognition of quasi-presiding officers	John Dement and William Cary jointly ascend to the podium and cooperatively serve as informal presiding officers, while the assembly attempts to construct a convention roll.
2. Compromise agreement on the convention roll	Leaders of the two parties, after a long debate on the propriety of using the list of delegates provided to the assembly by the Illinois secretary of state, reach an agreement in which that list is slightly modified. In the meantime, some of the delegates who had been detained for one reason or another finally arrive in Springfield.
3. Election of a temporary president	The convention roll is called. As the delegates answer to their names, they also vote on candidates for the post of temporary president. John Dement is elected.
4. Oath sworn by delegates	After a long debate over the form of the oath, the delegates are finally sworn into the convention. Although an oath was considered unnecessary in many nineteenth-century constitutional conventions, the Illinois Assembly treated the oath as an official confirmation of membership.
5. Election of a permanent president	The convention was now well along in the organization process, and a permanent president is smoothly and swiftly elected. Formal rules of procedure are subsequently adopted.

democracy) there is a catch 22: The set of individual wills that will be processed in the algorithm must be specified before the algorithm is chosen but, if a people (or their representatives) are to democratically decide how to specify their membership, an algorithm for that purpose must have already been adopted. The only way to resolve this dilemma is to arbitrarily create an algorithm by fiat.

The 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention directly confronted the opening dilemma and groped, sometimes blindly, toward an answer as it sought to discover what might be the least objectionable arbitrary decision that might allow it to organize. The opening dilemma was resolved in stages, beginning with the highly irregular recognition of two delegates as quasi-presiding officers (summarized in Table 2).

Although the course of this convention's organization was unique in many respects, the general form was quite common in the United States during the nineteenth century. Most assemblies would apparently open with the selection of a temporary presiding officer. In many cases, this selection was consensual. When it was not, as in the present case, the assembly would have to decide who could vote on the selection. After the selection of a temporary presiding officer, the assembly would then proceed to the construction of an official membership roll. When this was completed, the convention would elect a permanent presiding officer. Last and in many ways least, the assembly would adopt formal rules of procedure. By this point, the members, of course, had been offering motions and making points of order for some time.

Although the confusion was often amicable and even humorous, the opening moments of this convention amply illustrated the problems that can attend the opening dilemma. In the resulting deadlock, possible resolutions of the dilemma were constructed out of "general understandings" of the shared experience and values of the delegates. The delegates appealed to these understandings as they searched for the pivot upon which the convention could be levered into existence. For example, in the debate over what a "day" might be, the members cited legal interpretations that would have been at home in a court of law, thus appealing to the professional occupation of many of the delegates as lawyers. Similarly, the competing interpretations of the list of members presented by the secretary of state rested upon various understandings of the relation of the certificates forwarded by the county courts. These were treated by the Democrats as "matters of fact" of which the secretary had no more cognizance that did the delegates themselves while the Republicans gave much more credence to the list. The travel plans of the delegates, appealed to early on, were said to have been influenced by a general custom under which legislative assemblies began their deliberations on Tuesday because travel on Sunday was customarily understood to be a possible violation of the Sabbath, and it would take some members at least a day to arrive at the state capital.

The most pervasive reliance upon consensual understandings was common acquiescence to what was sometimes called "general parliamentary practice."⁴² In the absence of formal rules, what was considered appropriate and reasonable arose out of the prior experience of the delegates in other venues: most commonly the state legislature, but also city councils and party conventions. For example, Lawrence Church criticized Onias Skinner for mounting what we would call a filibuster.⁴³ Underpinning all these disputes was the understanding (indeed, certain knowledge) that most of the organization of the chamber would rest upon a division of the delegates into the two major party organizations: generally, the North (Republican) and South (Democratic) sides of the chamber.

The opening dilemma is theoretically irresolvable by purely democratic means. Without a presiding officer, a recognized membership, and formal rules of procedure, no assembly can democratically make a decision. However, assemblies have been, in fact, able to organize themselves for legislative deliberations without seeming to impeach their legitimacy as democratic agents serving the will of the people. One major contributor to their success is a shared orientation toward and respect for consensual political principles such as general parliamentary practice that allow delegates to act as if one of the legs of the opening dilemma—the absence of formal rules—had already been resolved.

⁴²Hoar referred to this "general parliamentary practice" as lex parliamentaria where it was recommended by "the best writers" as a means of organizing the proceedings in the absence of formally adopted rules. Hoar, Constitutional Conventions, 174. Lex Parliamentaria was a manual of parliamentary rules originally published in 1689, but the title later passed into popular use as a general term for all procedural rules; George Philips, Lex Parliamentaria; or, A Treatise of the Law and Custom of the Parliaments of England (London: Tim. Goodwin, 1689).

⁴³The propriety of extended debate reappeared later when one of the delegates attempted to move what he described was the "equivalent" to the "previous question." The problem for the convention was to somehow sneak into general parliamentary practice a motion that they all knew was not universally found in conventions, assemblies, and other political meetings. If they were successful in persuading their colleagues to accept the apparent subterfuge, they could cut off debate if one of their number insisted on delaying the proceedings. If not, they had no way, short of adoption of the appropriate rules, of moving forward. And that adoption, of course, could be filibustered as well.

Another is the intrusion of preexisting social and political identities. In many cases, for example, one of the formally organized political parties is commonly conceded to have a clear majority in an assembly once it is up and running. In such instances, many of the practical decisions concerning the initial organization of a chamber are made within that party and presented in the assembly to the minority as simply what is going to happen. When the majority party imposes its decisions on a convention or legislative assembly, its actions do not eliminate the opening dilemma, but it does make any resistance to its actions appear to be undemocratic obstruction. From that perspective, the problem facing the 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention was that it was unclear which party would control the chamber when the assembly was finally organized.

In sum, a convention could not resolve the opening dilemma without appeal to dimensions of political life external and prior to the legislative session. Everything else being equal, the ease with which a convention could organize depended on how robust those dimensions proved in producing a consensual understanding on how to proceed. In some ways, strong challenges to this understanding threaten to throw the proto-assembly back into chaos by exposing those aspects of a political culture that are routinely (and often unconsciously) taken for granted or assumed. For example, when delegates pointed out that an assembly had not adopted formal rules of procedure, it was almost as if they were denying that they could share and thus communicate in the very language of legislative deliberations. Even the observation that the assembly had not adopted formal rules of procedure, which usually took the form of a point of order addressed to the presiding officer, required use of that deliberative language, a language that the observation simultaneously used and denied. Such challenges often, if not always, addressed the foundational role of the assembly in creating a democratic government. However, that foundational role is thoroughly suspended, as we have seen, between the horns of the opening dilemma.⁴⁴

In the opening moments of the 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention there were at least three different levels of rhetorical abstraction. On the most mundane level, the delegates debated the specifics of the situation in which they were deliberating. These specifics included what evidence could legitimate the credentials of the members-elect, the proffering of commonsense resolutions of particular disagreements, and pragmatic suggestions that they take up other matters when they were stymied by a particular issue. On this level, the delegates practically confronted and dealt with the opening dilemma without recognizing it for what it was or that it was common to all such assemblies.

These exchanges frequently moved to a higher level in which the delegates cited what they considered to be persuasive precedents arising out of practice in previous constitutional conventions or metaphorical constructions of what they thought was reasonable arising out of personal experiences in their professions or political careers. Intended to generalize the situation in which the delegates found themselves by illustrating commonalities with other, similar venues, these precedents and metaphorical applications contended that political and social practice at other times and places could and should inform the present. As such, they constructed a fiction that could resolve the opening dilemma if the delegates accepted the precedent or metaphorical application.⁴⁵ As jerry-rigged acts of imagination, they were persuasive only to the extent that the political culture of the delegates allowed them to conceive of their relevance and applicability in the same way.⁴⁶

The most theoretically abstract level was reached when intense disagreement precluded pragmatism and imagination. For example, one of the most effective ways of rejecting the relevance of precedents and personal experience was to stress the sovereignty of the convention, a sovereignty that could not and should not be compromised by deference to external authorities, including past conventions. Whenever sovereignty of this kind was invoked, the delegates could be certain that they were impaling themselves on one of the horns of the opening dilemma (i.e., that the delegates were deliberating in a state of nature). They were similarly impaled whenever the delegates were reminded that the assembly's obligation to enact the people's will demanded an uncompromising devotion to democratic principles (e.g., that partisanship might inhibit a delegate's ability to truly represent his constituency).

In many assemblies (this Illinois Constitutional Convention was no exception), partisan identities and allegiances were criticized as fundamentally incompatible with pure representation of the popular will.⁴⁷ The delegates, of course, did not shed their party allegiances in the convention, but they were often compelled to present partisan proposals very circumspectly, using arguments that appeared to rest on anything but partisan interest or desires. The opening dilemma also showed its horns when delegates stressed that the way they deliberated would haunt the future peace and prosperity of their society. In all these ways, an insistence that the assembly democratically enact the will of the people threw the delegates upon the horns of the opening dilemma because there was just no way to both organize the convention for business and be completely faithful to democratic principles.⁴⁸

⁴⁵By "fiction," I mean that the delegates had not formally adopted parliamentary rules upon which these precedents or applications might have rested. Because that was the case, they could not govern the proceedings unless the delegates consensually seized upon them as a solution to their predicament.

⁴⁶Most of the delegates had some experience with deliberative assemblies, particularly legislatures, and were at least somewhat familiar with the mechanics of parliamentary procedure. For that reason, they often apparently assumed that this was the least problematic of the three prongs of the opening dilemma and relied on a consensual understanding of general parliamentary law to shape their discussions. Even so, the delegates sometimes ran into difficulties when they discovered, for example, that there was no way they could limit debate in the absence of formally adopted rules.

⁴⁷Political parties were and are artifacts of a politics that arises once a state has been created and thus carry with them, even within a constitutional convention, that politics (e.g., the desire to found a state in which one political party might enjoy an advantage over another). For that reason, it is possible to imagine that partisan interests might be incompatible with the enactment of the popular will when a state is created, but that partisan organizations would be compatible with the democratic politics that was created by the founding of that state.

⁴⁸This is a particularly acute problem for democratic states because they cannot, in theory, presume what the will of the people might demand at the founding. When non-democratic states are created, the problem is both partly evaded (because the political elite presume that they know what the people need and therefore want, even if the people do ⁴⁴While the verbatim record of debates during the preliminary organization of the Illinois Constitutional Convention repeatedly illustrates the opening dilemma in which the members found themselves, the Journal of the Constitutional Convention of the State of Illinois (Springfield, IL: State Journal Printing Office, 1870) omits references to almost all the proceedings prior to the formal adoption of parliamentary rules. That journal, in fact, begins with a bland listing of the official membership of the convention with no explanation of how that membership was determined and then immediately proceeds to the election of John Dement as president pro tem with no reference to his initial "dual presidency" with William Cary. As with most official journals, this one recognized only "official" acts and decisions, and an extended confrontation with the opening dilemma is necessarily prior to the creation of a situation in which such acts and decisions can occur. Since the vast majority of all convention records are in the form of official journals, the possible revelation of the opening dilemma in constitutional conventions is limited to those few that have verbatim records that begin before the body is officially organized.

In all these things, the delegates only gradually came to understand that they had blundered into the opening dilemma because they had been entirely unaware of its existence and implications before they had gathered together.

At the beginning of all conventions and legislatures in which all the members are elected at the same time, there is thus something that we might, perhaps unfairly, call a “dirty little secret.” The secret is that any legislature organized for the purpose of founding a democracy must first lay its own foundation by violating, one way or another, democratic principles. And the reason that this can be termed a “secret” is that it is never openly admitted. The secret can also be called “dirty” in the sense that the violation of democratic principles impeaches the very authority of the assembly as it goes about the task of constructing the legitimacy of the democratic state it is founding. That fact opens the assembly and the delegates to the charge of hypocrisy at the very outset of their deliberations. However, we should always remember that the problem ultimately arises from an unavoidable contradiction in the logic of the situation and is thus not the product of a willful failure of virtue. Finally, whether or not this is a “little” secret usually depends on whether or not the delegates in the assembly share a wide, deep political culture.⁴⁹ If they do, they might not even notice the arbitrary ground upon which the opening decisions in the assembly are made.⁵⁰

And this raises the question of why the contradiction that lies at the very heart of democratic assemblies is not openly acknowledged. The answer lies in the mystical nature of democratic constitutions and their role as the sacred core of a society’s political culture. The popular legitimacy of a democratic state precludes an open acknowledgment that the construction of its constitutional charter was the result of a process that elided the way in which it contradicted its own principles. That contradiction, along with other messy aspects of democratic foundings, must be veiled. We, as students of these processes, may have become jaded through not yet know what that is) and more complex (because the political elite must demonstrate in other ways that their knowledge of this anticipated popular will is justified). Richard Franklin Bense, The Founding of Modern States (Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 2022).

⁴⁹A strong, shared political culture alleviates the risks otherwise associated with the opening dilemma by encouraging a mutual respect between delegates and a belief that the regime in which they operate is more important than their sectarian interests and commitments. It is very unclear that the United States now enjoys such a political culture.

⁵⁰The delegates to the 1787 Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, for example, failed to recognize that they confronted anything like an opening dilemma. They swiftly made George Washington their presiding officer by acclamation, informally recognized that each had been authorized to represent their respective states, and then consensually adopted very rudimentary rules of procedure. But this convention was very small and largely composed of a political elite who shared a common goal. Later, however, the status of this convention as a body that could represent the will of the people was severely challenged by those who opposed ratification of the document they had written. The latter could reasonably question whether the “We, the people...” stood for anything other than the presumptuous audacity of those who had attended the convention. They also could reasonably question whether a convention formally called to revise the Articles of Confederation could simply discard that document and write an entirely new constitution. The delegates to the Constitutional Convention jerry-rigged a solution by implying that the state-ratifying conventions when they ratified the new Constitution were simultaneously (and retrospectively) authorizing the convention that had drafted it. In this case, the opening dilemma was indirectly recognized and resolved in a way that basically set it aside. Michael J. Klarman, The Framers’ Coup: The Making of the United States Constitution (New York: Oxford University Press, 2016), 134–36, 310–13. The ratification procedure adopted in 1787 did not resolve the opening dilemma, either in the convention itself or in its conception of the people (the latter was simply shunted off to the state legislatures that organized the ratifying conventions). In this as in all constitutional conventions, there is no way to compel a convention to provide a mechanism for popular approval of the document they write. This, in fact, was the major issue underpinning the lengthy debate over the oath in the 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention.

constant exposure to the imperfections of democracy-in-reality. Even so, a fundamental principle of Western political culture for centuries is the notion that there exists (or can exist) a popular will and that this popular will can be translated into a constitutional founding. Millions of people, in fact, have sacrificed their lives for that very principle, a principle that underpins the claims of democratic states upon the very lives of its citizens. Measured against the project of establishing the popular legitimacy of a democratic state, the opening dilemma may seem rather paltry—until someone calls attention to it and notes that the way in which decisions are made in a founding assembly may forever haunt the future of their political community.

Turning to the contemporary practice of politics, we might conclude that the opening dilemma has become unimportant because institutions such as political parties, a broad consensus on parliamentary procedures, and a general pragmatic recognition that a constitutional convention must start somewhere and somehow will overcome any inconvenience arising from the opening dilemma.⁵¹ The existence of strong political parties, for example, can facilitate resolution of the opening dilemma when one party enjoys an obvious and cohesive majority of the delegates. But let us imagine for a moment a national convention that is called to consider a revision of the United States Constitution. Such a convention, for example, would be the only way that proportional representation on the basis of population might be imposed on the United States Senate, a perennial demand by many democratic theorists and other observers of American politics. Imagine that such a convention is called, and in the election of delegates, questions are raised as to the propriety of some of their credentials. Imagine further that no party has elected an uncontested majority of those delegates. We would then be in the political space previously inhabited by the 1869 Illinois Constitutional Convention. However, unlike that convention, we might very much doubt that our present democratic system could survive a direct confrontation with the opening dilemma.

The problem is that the commitment to democracy in the United States is currently quite weak. Given the current state of American politics, such a commitment requires a strong belief in the will of the people (a metaphysical concept that is now only tenuously tethered to actual political institutions and processes), a much weaker alignment of individuals with political parties (which now rival the democratic system as a claim on loyalties), and a frank acknowledgment of the possible emergence of the opening dilemma as a political obstacle to the success of a constitutional convention (so that delegates do not blunder into a crisis that they do not comprehend). Taken together, these things carry contradictory implications (e.g., a frank acknowledgment of the opening dilemma would undermine belief in the will of the people). The pragmatic solution is to forgo the calling of a constitutional convention that might address the very serious political and policy issues now confronting the nation. That solution both implicitly recognizes that the American polity lacks broad support for democratic norms and encourages further deterioration of that support as citizens come to understand that they lack a consensus on both the conception and practice of democracy. Lacking a deep consensus on and commitment to a common political culture, the opening dilemma cannot be wished away, conveniently swept under a rug, transformed into a political process with neither a beginning nor an end, or committed to a pragmatism grounded in common sense.
