

Streetscapes of War and Revolution

Prague entered the First World War as the third city of the Habsburg Empire, but emerged in 1918 as the capital of a brand new nation-state, Czechoslovakia. Claire Morelon explores what this transition looked, sounded, and felt like at street level. Through deep archival research, she has carefully reconstructed the sensorial texture of the city, from the posters plastered on walls, to the shop windows' displays, the badges worn by passersby, and the crowds gathering for protest or celebration. The result is both an atmospheric account of life amid war and regime change and a fresh interpretation of imperial collapse from below, in which the experience of life on the Habsburg home front is essential to understanding the post-Versailles world order that followed. Prague is the perfect case study for examining the transition from empire to nation statehood, hinging on revolutionary dreams of fairer distribution and new forms of political participation. In recent years the field of modern history has been enriched by the exploration of two parallel histories. These are the social and cultural history of armed conflict, and the impact of military events on social and cultural history.

Studies in the Social and Cultural History of Modern Warfare presents the fruits of this growing area of research, reflecting both the colonization of military history by cultural historians and the reciprocal interest of military historians in social and cultural history, to the benefit of both. The series offers the latest scholarship in European and non-European events from the 1850s to the present day.
