One might expect to find a solution to social problems in the work of social scientists. But when it comes to prediction and control the social sciences seem to have little to offer. Why is this? Are questions about human nature – about human needs and human deeds – incapable of being answered by the objective methods of the natural sciences, methods that yield discoveries we can put to practical use? And, if so, has this something to do with the fact that it is man himself who conducts the inquiry?

These, and related questions, are answered in this fourth volume of Royal Institute of Philosophy lectures by social scientists and philosophers of the social sciences. Among the contributors are H. B. Acton, Michael Drake, Frank Cioffi, Paul Halmos, Peter Laslett, Donald MacKay, Basil Mitchell, R. S. Peters and Peter Winch.
