IN MEMORIAM

The stormy career of WILLMOORE KENDALL came to an end on June 30, 1967. Death occurred in his home a few hours after a visit to the doctor who was treating him for a heart disorder. He was 58 years of age. Since 1963 he had been Chairman of the Department of Politics and Economics at the University of Dallas. He is survived by his wife and mother. He had two previous marriages but no children.

Kendall was born and grew up in Oklahoma. He entered Northwestern University at the age of 14, but withdrew for a period of further study under his father's direction. His B.A. degree was from the University of Oklahoma. His first years of graduate training, at Northwestern University and the University of Illinois, were in French and Spanish literature. While an instructor in Spanish at the University of Illinois, he was named a Rhodes Scholar. He read political theory and economics under R. G. Collingwood at Pembroke College, receiving the B.A. in 1935 and the M.A. three years later. Upon completing study at Oxford he went to Madrid as a correspondent for United Press and observer of the Spanish Civil War.

Kendall returned to the United States to study for the Ph.D. degree in political science at the University of Illinois. Here he wrote the dissertation, John Locke and the Doctrine of Majority Rule, which was later published and gave him a claim to scholarship that could never be impeached. Before completing the dissertation and immediately afterward he taught at Louisiana State University, Hobart College, and the University of Richmond. At the outbreak of World War II he joined the staff of the Office of the Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs. During 1944-46 he was in the United States Army, serving principally in liaison work with Spanish-speaking allies of the United States. At the close of the war he accepted an appointment in political science at the University of Minnesota only to be borrowed back for service in the organization that soon emerged as the Central Intelligence
