REFLECTIONS ON ANTI-AMERICANISM IN OUR TIMES

PAUL HOLLANDER

& JOHN SISK, EDWARD J. BAKER, YUDHA LELANA,
BEREL LANG, ABRAHAM MARTIN MURRAY, JOHN HELLER

- The "Moonie" phenomenon may be fading, which means we can now look back on what that fracas was about and try to relearn some lessons about religious freedom in America. Leo Sandon studied the Moonies at length. He wouldn't want his daughter to be one, but he is even more certain that he wouldn't want his grandchildren to inherit the repressive spirit that many critics of "religious deviance" have been fostering.
- Many years ago, when the Chinese Maoists took over Tibet, the Tibetans clapped their hands. The Chinese thought they were being welcomed, but the clapping was an old Tibetan way of trying to ward off evil spirits. Dawa Norbu lived in Tibet at the time and recalls what it was like to adjust to, and finally to escape from, the new communalism of the "great proletarian revolution."
- The U.N. special session on disarmament refocuses attention on what is perhaps the overriding moral issue of our time. Joseph Fahey points out that old "legitimations" of the arms race are collapsing in his forceful argument against the balance of terror. The context is Roman Catholic teaching on war and peace, but the consequence of Fahey's thesis is to engage all of us in rethinking the threat of force in international relations.

In addition: Responses to Rabbi Balfour Brickner's May article on Christian evangelism of the Jews. A revisionist interpretation of the recent renaissance of "neo-conservatism" in public discourse. An expose of alleged "value-free" teaching in public schools. A debate on whether "human rights" can be universally applied. A new appreciation of Woodrow Wilson sixty years later. The search for a very elusive "Carter Doctrine" in international relations. And a roundup of recent books relating ethical judgment to public policy.
