

New Directions in New Testament Studies

PATRICK HENRY

With remarkable clarity and skill, Patrick Henry surveys many of the developments which have occurred in New Testament research in recent years and puts these in perspective. His central argument is that New Testament study can no longer be treated as an isolated discipline; to understand the present situation, it is vital to examine the influence of sociology, psychology and the liberal arts on current research.

'In this book Patrick Henry offers much more than a guide through the bewilderingments and conflicts of contemporary New Testament studies. He is himself a venturesome explorer, and his judgments, if often controversial, are always interesting and scholarly.' (Professor John Macquarrie)

(February, limp) £6.95

Jewish and Christian Self-Definition Vol. 1

E. P. SANDERS (Ed.)

This is the first volume in a series of three which examines the way in which Judaism and Christianity parted company in the second and third centuries. In the first century, both Judaism and Christianity retained a wide degree of diversity, but over the next two centuries, both religions narrowed and began to exclude certain Christian or Jewish views in the process of normative self-definition. The first volume is concerned with Christianity and concentrates on its development from being a sect to becoming a church; its social setting and its attitude to outsiders.

(April) £10.50

The Fifth Evangelist

A. M. HUNTER

Professor Hunter demonstrates the clear link which exists between St Paul and the four evangelists and through an examination of this evangelist as writer, theologian, saint and friend, the author illuminates the vital importance of Paul's gospel with its understanding of sin, and redemptive salvation in Christ for us today. There are also studies of other New Testament themes.

(May, paper) £2.95

The Epistle to the Romans

ERNST KASEMANN

One of the classic commentaries of our time... a worthy successor to the Romans of Luther and Barth.

(June) £12.50

SCM PRESS LTD

58 Bloomsbury Street London WC1B 3QX

© Cambridge University Press 1980

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS, CAMBRIDGE