

Editor's note

In this issue of the NJL, we introduce a new Debate Section to encourage readers to express their opinions on linguistics topics of current interest.

The new logo on the cover of the journal indicates that NJL is now published by Taylor & Francis, who have taken over responsibility for the international journals of the Scandinavian University Press. The Oslo office of Taylor & Francis is handling NJL. The transition has gone well and we believe our readers will greatly benefit from the change.

Call for papers

The second issue of Vol. 24, 2001, will be a special issue devoted to "The Lexicon in Linguistic Theory", edited by Per Anker Jensen.

For many years the role of the lexicon in linguistic theory has been a major issue of discussion in linguistics. Different linguistic theories have presented widely differing views on such topics as: The role and structure of the lexicon as a module of linguistic theory; how to model idiosyncratic and (semi-)productive aspects of the lexicon; the organization of lexical knowledge in individual entries, raising the problem of accounting for the properties of word forms seemingly belonging as central members of more than one word class, whether in terms of "mixed categories", "prototypical lexical categories" or "underspecification". The purpose of the special issue is to help bring out current theoretical positions on these topics, thereby facilitating communication among different schools of thought concerning the lexicon and its role in linguistic theory.

We therefore invite you to submit papers addressing problems relating to one or several of the issues mentioned above by 31 January 2001. Please send your submission to:

Cambridge Journals

Journal of Linguistics

Journal of Linguistics is concerned with all branches of theoretical linguistics, including syntax, morphology, phonology, phonetics, semantics, pragmatics and historical, sociological, computational, psychological and applied aspects of language and linguistic theory. The journal also provides an excellent survey of recent publications in the field with review articles on major works marking important theoretical advances, and about twenty book reviews and shorter notices in each issue.

The full list of publications received and the comprehensive index published annually make the journal an even more valuable resource for both general and applied linguists.
